Students in five Kansas City schools are noticing changes as they settle in this fall, like the addition of calming corners—safe spaces where children feeling overwhelmed can go to calm down and regain control—in many of their classrooms. Calming corners are just one part of the work that is happening as Synergy’s school-based outreach expands beyond anti-bullying and safe dating programs to address the underlying causes of challenging behaviors.

The idea that untreated trauma hinders learning and is the root of many disruptive classroom behaviors is not a new one, but the movement to create trauma informed schools is just gaining steam—partly because the problem is layered and complex. Schools across the country are joining the trauma informed movement, and many are partnering with non-profit agencies to provide the expertise and resources needed to achieve comprehensive solutions.

It’s an exciting time at Synergy as we build this program with our school partners, breaking down the barriers students and their families face in accessing needed services. With a Synergy therapist on-site, children can receive the mental health services they need right at school; while a Synergy social worker helps meet the needs at home for families who may be struggling. Classroom educators work directly with all students to teach social and emotional skills that are foundational to academic success and positive interactions with others.
“When we address underlying trauma, we can isolate its effect” says Gwen O’Brien who oversees the school-based program for Synergy. “These integrated services are designed to support the whole child with positive outcomes for the entire school and community.”

Partner schools are already seeing results. At Crossroads Academy Central Street, staff say the calming corners have been a huge success. "We have seen a major improvement in students being able to self-regulate and stay in class. This is a huge win for us!"
